Approach

MILESTONE 1 PHASE:

'FS_init' runs upon the startup of the file system, either formatting a new volume or loading a pre-existing volume. To do this, check the Volume Control Block (VCB), which resides in the first block of the volume. As the name indicates, it is the block that controls or holds the information about the volume. To start the file system, we should check the first block of the volume for validation to see if there is a matching existing signature. If the signature does not match the volume, the program will initialize it and free space. If the signature matches volume, the system will load free space and the root directory into memory.

The loaded free space system will use a discontiguous memory storage method called FAT, short for File Allocation Table. Like a linked list, the FAT system has multiple linked lists, with each memory block pointing to the next to denote memory allocated for use. Each linked list's end is marked by a sentinel value, which we have chosen to be FF FF FF FD. The benefit of using FAT is the reduction of potential internal memory fragmentation, which allows for the usage of the entire volume. However, the downside of FAT is that it is greater than other storage methods like bitmaps, and it is not as efficient speed-wise as it requires traversing the links to access specific pieces of data.

The directory system starts with the creation of the root directory, and every other directory will be a child of the root. To create a directory, whether it is the root or any other directory, we need to specify a minimum number of entries. The minimum number of entries should never be less than 2 because we need a "." (dot) entry for the current directory and a ".." (dot-dot) entry for the parent directory. With the minimum number of entries specified, we then calculate the number of bytes and blocks needed, and request the free space system to allocate that space for the directory.

One aspect we forgot to consider during this phase was the expansion of a directory, which was later implemented in Milestone 2. I will describe the expand directory function, which is relatively similar to the create directory function. We take the old directory size and double it, making sure to copy the old directory's entries into the new, expanded directory. We then free the now-old and unused directory. Finally, we process the directory by initializing each entry to a known free state, request free space for the expanded directory, and write the changes to disk.

MILESTONE 2 PHASE:

This component comprises separate functions that handle shell commands interacting with a directory in our file system. Therefore, it is crucial to implement the `parsepath` function, which every separate function relies on. As the name implies, '`parsePath`' is a function that parses a path and checks for:

1. Whether it is a valid path.
2. What the last element is.
3. Who the parent directory is.
4. The index of the previous element in the parent directory.

Another important shell command is `md`, which uses the `mk_dir` function. This function uses the previously mentioned `parsepath` function to locate where it is trying to create a directory. It then checks if it can create the directory, expanding the size of the directory if needed. Finally, it creates the directory and writes to the disk so that the information is persistent upon successive program runs.

The shell command `ls` utilizes the `fs_opendir`, `fs_readdir`, and `fs_closedir` functions to display past and newly created files and directories. The `fs_opendir` function provides basic information about the directory, such as the directory itself, how many entries are used, and the current position within the entries. This information will later be used by `fs_readdir` to populate a directory info struct, which the shell will print. Cleanup for these resources will be done by `fs_closedir`.

With the ability to display and create files, the shell command `cd` allows for navigation through our file system. This command uses the `fs_setcwd` function to traverse the path, whether it be relative or absolute, and set the global current working directory to its new destination. The traversal of the path implies the use of the `parsepath` function again.

Finally, we have the last major shell command that interfaces with the directory: the `mv` command, which uses the `fs_move` function. This function essentially traverses the given destination path and finds an empty entry where the source directory entry will be copied. Once the source directory entry is successfully copied to the destination, the original entry in the source directory will be deleted.

FILE HANDLING PHASE:

This component contributes to the other half of the shell function, which deals with files and their contents. It pertains to a few specific functions: `b_open`, `b_write`, `b_read`, and `b_close`. These functions are reminiscent of Assignment 5, where we were tasked with reading a file. The approach for the overlapping functions is relatively similar, with the primary purpose of `b_open` being to obtain a new, unused file descriptor, populate the file control block's variables, and perform flag checks.

The same approach applies to `b_read`, which still follows the same three-part approach to reading the file. The only difference is the additional flag checks and noting that the file control block's variables could change because `b_write` also uses them, so initializing them to 0 ensures their values are certain.

With the write function, which can be approached similarly to assignment 2, we keep filling our buffer until it is full, then write the entire block to disk. If our buffer is full and there is still data left to be written, we will expand the file to get more blocks. This will repeat until everything is written into the file.

When all operations are finished, `b_close` will clean up and use resources for the functions above.

Description:

Note: The entire volume is displayed in the following hex dumps is in little-endian format.

Volume Control Block:

The VCB is a repository for information about the volume. It will be the first thing loaded into memory when the file system starts. Once loaded into memory, the program checks the signature to see if the volume is already formatted. If the volume is not formatted, the program will initialize it and free space. If the volume is formatted, the system will load free space and the root directory into memory.

Counting up all the highlighted portions from 0x000200 to 0x000223, you get exactly 36 bytes, which matches the predicted structure of our VCB. Another giveaway is that we LBAwrite the VCB in the sample volume at block location 0, so if we hex dump starting at that location, it should give us the VCB. We further verify the information by breaking down each highlighted section to match our obtained values. We achieve the following breakdown by checking the hex dump and remembering to convert from little-endian to big-endian.

- 0x000200-0x000207

- The signature we picked is 52 42 69 65 72 6D 61 6E; this value when displayed in the hexdump's ASCII portion will show up as RBierman, which is our group name.
- To check if this matches our decimal signature:
  - small endian -> big endian
    - 52 42 69 65 72 6D 61 6E -> 6E 61 6D 72 65 69 42 52
    - 6E 61 6D 72 65 69 42 52 in decimal 7953758755008102994 (our chosen signature)

- 0x000208-0x00020B

- The size of each block is 512 bytes.
- small endian -> big endian
- 00 02 00 00 -> 00 00 02 00
- 00 00 02 00 in decimal is 512

- 0x00020C-0x00020F

- The total number of blocks in the volume is 19531.
- small endian -> big endian
- 4B 4C 00 00 -> 00 00 4C 4B
- 00 00 4C 4B in decimal 19531
- 0x000210-0x000213
  - The location of the free space block is at block 1.
  - small endian -> big endian
  - 01 00 00 00 -> 00 00 00 01
  - 00 00 00 01 in decimal 1
- 0x000214-0x000217
  - The first free block is at block 157, because the fat table takes up 153 blocks to keep track of free space, and the root directory takes up another 3 blocks.
  - small endian -> big endian
  - 9E 00 00 00 -> 00 00 00 9E
  - 00 00 00 01 in decimal 158
- 0x000218-0x00021B
  - The size of our free space in blocks
  - small endian -> big endian
  - 99 00 00 00 -> 00 00 00 99
  - 00 00 00 99 in decimal 153
- 0x00021C-0x00021F
  - After initializing our file system, the total number of free blocks is 0x4BAD = 19374.
  - small endian -> big endian
  - AE 4B 00 00 -> 00 00 4B AE
  - 00 00 4B AE in decimal 19373
- 0x000220-0x000223
  - The root directory is located at block 154.
  - Refer to the free space and root directory section to show that it is there
  - small endian -> big endian
  - 9A 00 00 00 -> 00 00 00 9A
  - 00 00 00 9A in decimal 154

The remainder of the block is zeros because no other data is stored in the Volume control block.

Free Space structure:

We decided to store our free space in a file allocation table (FAT). This is an externally linked list structure, where the FAT points to the next node (array index for array implementation of linked list), and each node represents a block in volume. Every entry in the FAT is a value pointing to the next block; entries with a sentinel value of 0xFFFFFFFF indicate the end of the linked list.

The VCB block in the volume is marked with the sentinel value to indicate a used block. The following 153 blocks store the FAT, ending with the sentinel value. Since we initialized and wrote the root directory into the disk, this process is shown in the FAT. After the free space list is stored, we can see another sentinel value after four blocks, indicating the end of the root directory blocks.

Here is our entire dump of free space. (Click here to skip to analysis)

Free Space Analysis:

Since there are a lot of free space between the important free space data, we will take portions of the free space to analyze.

This is a portion of the second block on the volume.

- We have stored the VCB starting from block 1; thus, we should expect to see the sentinel value on the first block, indicating that this block is used in the FAT.

- 0x000404-0x000663

- From the second integer until the end of the FAT are values pointing to the next index, like a linked list. These are stored as integers, explaining why they are indicated with 4 hex values in the hex dump, 4 bytes for each link. For example, we can see that the next 4 bytes after the VCB (highlighted yellow), 0x00000002 in hex and 2 in decimal, points to the second index, and the next 4 points to the third index. This link will continue until we reach the end of the FAT indicated by another sentinel value.

This is a separate portion of a different block, skipping to block 3 in the hex dump.

- 0x000664-0x000667

- Knowing that our volume size is 19531 blocks with block sizes 512, we calculated that our FAT will take up 153 blocks. Index 153 in the FAT would be a sentinel value indicating the end of the linked list. The value 0xFFFFFFF at this location matches our expectations, since the index before the sentinel value is 0x00000099, which is 153 in decimal, pointing to the sentinel value, matching the size of the FAT.

- 0x000668-0x000673

- These bytes represent the linked list of the root directory, indicating that the root directory occupies these blocks.

- 0x000670-0x000673

- Because we initialized our root directory with 19 directory entries by default, and the actual entries are calculated to fill in to accommodate the size of blocks, we should expect it to take 3 blocks when we first initialize our filesystem. This sentinel value 0xFFFFFFF is evidence of that since after 4 blocks from the FAT sentinel value, we can see another one indicating the end of the root directory.

- 0x000678-0x01352B

- This is our entire free space in the FAT; it shows how much free space we have through a linked list system right after the root directory ends. The VCB shows that this will take up 152 blocks as we represent the volume's free space, which is 19373 blocks.

This is another separate portion of a different block, skipping to block 153 in the hex dump.

The root directory starts at offset 0x13600 when our volume size is 9999872 and the block size is 512. Above is half of block 154; it shows the “dot dot”, dot, and the first empty directory entry in the root directory.

- 0x13600 - 0x1360F

- Starting at the beginning of the block, because of the structure of our directory entry struct the first 2 values are the date created and last modified.

- 0x13610-0x013642

- The filename dot or “2E” is “.” in ASCII and the rest is just 00.

- 0x013647

- Is a directory marker 0x64 in ASCII is ‘d’ which indicates that it indeed is a directory

- 0x013648-0x01364B

- 0x00020000 is the size of the directory which is 512 bytes. Our directory entry takes up 80 bytes. We are initializing a minimum of 6 entries. That requires 1 block.

- 0x01364C-0x01365F

- 0x9A000000 is the location of the root directory which is at block 154.

- 0x01369C-0x01369F

- This is referencing itself, the root directory.

- 0x013660

- This is the name field for the dot-dot or “2E 2E” directory entry the zeros are the remainder of the space for the DEs name

- 0x0136E8-0x0136EB
  - Empty directories are initialized with a location of -1

Issues and Resolutions:

During development, we encountered an issue regarding access to the volume control block, file allocation table, and root directory. The first challenge arose during the initialization of free space and the root directory. Here, we assign initial values like total free space to the volume control block. The second challenge emerged when attempting to read data directly into the FAT blocks during the filesystem initialization process. The read (LBRead) occurs in the fsInit file; however, since another file, freeSpace.c, handles free space initialization, we initially attempted to use pass-by-reference to share the pointer across various methods in different files. Unfortunately, this approach proved problematic for effectively maintaining and accessing the VCB, FAT, and root directory.

An image of what we initially did:

 } else { //Case: File system is not yet initialized vcb->signature = SIGNATURE;
    vcb->blockSize = blockSize;
    vcb->totalBlocks = numberofBlocks;

    // Initialize the FAT free space management system if (initFreeSpace(numberofBlocks, blockSize, vcb) != 0) { printf("Failed to initialize free space!\n");
        free(vcb);
        free(FAT);
        return -1;
    }

We resolved this by turning the VCB, FAT, and root directories into global variables accessible by other files using the extern keyword. This allows us to allocate memory for these structures and variables in the “fsInit” file while accessing and initializing the data in a separate file.

Image of the solution:

extern struct VCB* vcb;
extern int* FAT;

// ...
DirectoryEntry *initDirectory(int minEntries, DirectoryEntry *parent)
{
    // Calculate memory requirements for the directory
    int bytesNeeded = minEntries * sizeof(DirectoryEntry);
    int blocksNeeded = (bytesNeeded + vcb->blockSize - 1) / vcb->blockSize;
    int bytesToAlloc = blocksNeeded * vcb->blockSize;
    int actualEntries = bytesToAlloc / sizeof(DirectoryEntry);

Another issue was memory leakage at the end of the FAT hex dump (hex dumping block 154). Despite marking the end of the FAT with a sentinel value, two extra hexes were beyond the scope of the FAT data.

Image of the issue:

We initially thought the FAT was adding extra links beyond the end of free space, but that wasn't the issue. After some debugging, we found the solution and problem in the most unlikely place. We thought the space necessary for the FAT system was only the number of blocks * the size of the integer, as we needed to store the "numberOfBlock" amount of links.

Image of the error:

FAT = malloc(numberOfBlocks * sizeof(int));
if (FAT == NULL) {
    printf("Failed to instantiate FAT!\n");
    free(vcb);
    return -1;
}

```

However, this was fixed simply by correctly calculating the correct block space required for the FAT (shown below):

int blocksNeeded = ((numberOfBlocks * sizeof(int)) + blockSize - 1) / blockSize; FAT = malloc(blocksNeeded * blockSize);
if (FAT == NULL) {

Issue: GitHub

Throughout the project, there were many issues with file conflicts when pulling or merging when the team decided to switch to a non-branch approach for GitHub. There were frequent merge conflicts, file overriding, and confusion about using GitHub effectively and adequately in a team environment.

Resolution: each team member had their way of dealing with these conflicts. Some decided first to store their code in a temporary store medium when just pulling or pushing. Others to force push, as demonstrated below:

Issue: LS

One issue that occurred was when the command `ls` was executed whenever a directory reached its maximum capacity and we tried to display the directory entries, it would display every entry except for the last one.

Another problem we were running into was having a random directory not print if it was the last item in the directory. It was always the last item when it was the last item

Resolution: Added an = to make sure that we included the last item, ls displays, thus the function responsible for that is readdir. Take a look at this line of code:

// Past the end of the number of directories if (dirp->dirEntryPosition >= dirp->directory->size / sizeof(DirectoryEntry)) { return NULL;
}

return dirp->di;

Adding the “=” sign properly accounts for all the directories, no more, no less.

Issue: Files overwriting each other

Another issue occurred when creating a file using the b_open function. We were modifying a temporary file rather than the actual file itself and reassigning it back to the original file. We initially created a temp file to resolve memory leaks, but it exacerbated the issue more.

DirectoryEntry* file = malloc(sizeof(DirectoryEntry*));

Resolution: We resolved this by separating the file creation into a helper function. The new approach allows us to treat the file properly as an entry rather than a separate, unique entity. Since we already initialized the entries when creating a new directory, we can just find the unused directory entry and populate the metadata appropriately. In doing so, we removed the overwriting issue and fixed the file creation.

Image of the solution:

int createFile(ppInfo* ppi) { time_t currentTime = time(NULL);

    // Find first available directory entry or expand if all space is occupied int vacantDE = findUnusedDE(ppi->parent);
    if (vacantDE == -1) {
        ppi->parent = expandDirectory(ppi->parent);
        if (ppi->parent == NULL) {
            return -1;
        }
        vacantDE = findUnusedDE(ppi->parent);
    }
    if (vacantDE < 0) {
        return -1;
    }

    // Initialize all the metadata ppi->parent[vacantDE].dateCreated = currentTime;
    ppi->parent[vacantDE].dateModified = currentTime;
    ppi->parent[vacantDE].isDirectory = ' ';
    ppi->parent[vacantDE].location = -2;
    strncpy(ppi->parent[vacantDE].name, ppi->lastElement, sizeof(ppi->parent[vacantDE].name));
    ppi->parent[vacantDE].size = 0;
    ppi->lastElementIndex = vacantDE;

    // Write data to the disk
    int blocksToWrite = (ppi->parent->size + vcb->blockSize - 1) / vcb->blockSize;
    if (writeBlock(ppi->parent, blocksToWrite, ppi->parent->location) == -1) {
        return -1;
    }

    return 0;
}
```

Details of how each of the functions works:

Helper/Utility Functions:

normalizePath

This function helps sanitize and makes the current working directory path more consistent by removing redundant and unnecessary elements, such as “.” (current directory) and “..” (parent directory). The function tokenizes the path using “/” as its delimiter and stores each token (an individual directory) in the ‘pathArray.’ The array will expand whenever it gets full to ensure that it can support lengthy paths. After separating the individual directories, the function will iterate through the array, filtering out the redundant elements of “.” and “..” by backtracking the path structure unless at the root. The function stores the kept directories as indices to ‘pathArray’ in a new array called ‘indexToKeep.’ The final step is to join the new path segments with a “/” delimiter at the end of each segment, except when the path is root.

Example: “/student/home/./..” -> “/student/”

loadDir

This function loads a directory from the disk (volume) into memory. It retrieves the requested directory's location and instantiates a temporary directory entry. The function calculates the number of blocks needed to store the directory entries. It then calls ‘readBlock’ with the required blocks and directory location to load the directory data into memory. The function returns either the loaded directory, which needs to be freed or NULL if it fails.

findUnusedDE

This function searches for a space in a directory to add a new entry. It iterates through the directory entries and checks if the location is -1, which indicates a free entry slot. The function will either return the index of a free entry slot or -1 if not found for further processing to expand the directory.

findNameInDir

This function searches for the index of an entry (directory or file) within a given directory. It iterates through the directory entries and searches for the specified entry name. The function will either return the index of the found directory entry or -1 if not found.

isEmpty

This function checks whether the directory is empty. It iterates through the entries and checks if there are any entries besides “.” (the current directory) and “..” (the parent directory). It will return 0 if the directory is empty or -1 if it isn’t. This function primarily checks if the file system can remove the directory.

parsePath

This function is the main foundation for the file system. Its role is to traverse the given path, whether absolute or relative, and populate the ppInfo structure with information regarding the final directory entry (the rightmost directory in the path): the parent (the directory that holds the entry), name of the last element, and its index in the parent. The function first validates the input and then determines whether the provided path is absolute (starting with “/” and traversing from the root) or relative (starting from the current working directory). It then loads the parent directory (root or current working directory) into memory to prepare for the next part.

The central part of the function first duplicates the input path to avoid modifying the original before tokenizing the path with the “/” delimiter. The first step is to check whether the path is simply the root directory. If it is not, the function will traverse one subdirectory at a time by meticulously finding the subdirectory’s index within the current directory using the function ‘`findNameInDir`.’ If any error occurs, such as attempting to traverse into a nonexistent entry, a file, then -1 will be returned. Although the function returns a status integer, the primary return data is the passed-by-reference of ppInfo.

deleteBlob

This function updates the File Allocation Table (FAT) to release a file’s location, marking the space available for other files to use later. It clears the file’s sentinel value in the FAT and changes it to be the next free block. Lastly, the function updates the first free block and writes the updated FAT to disk using ‘`writeBlock`’ to make the changes persistent, returning 0 on success or -1 on failure.

createFile

This function helps create a file on the file system. It first locates an unused entry slot (using ‘`findUnusedDE`’) or expands the directory with ‘`expandDirectory`’ if none is available. Since the entry already has placeholder data created during directory initialization, we can overwrite it with the updated information for the file: dates, is it a directory, location, name, and size. The last thing the function does is write the updated directory to disk using ‘`writeBlock`’ with the total block space the directory occupies. The function returns 0 on success and -1 on failure.

updateWorkingDir

This function helps ensure that we do not free the root directory or the current working directory whenever we need to release the memory of a directory entry. It also enforces the file system to point the root and current working directory global variables to their correct directories.

File System Interface Functions:

fs_setcwd

The ‘`cd`’ shell command uses this function to set the global current working directory variable to the correct directory. It first parses the path with ‘`parsePath`’ to acquire the user's current location and handles the root directory separately. The function then loads the directory into memory using ‘`loadDir`’ before copying it into the global current working directory variable. The function will then determine the new path name to assign to the `cwdPathName` global variable. It will decide whether the new path is absolute or relative and format it respectively for ‘`normalizePath`’ to clean up redundancy. Lastly, the function writes the current working directory to memory with ‘`writeBlock`’ and returns 0 on success or -1 on failure.

fs_getcwd

This function simply copies the current working directory path stored in ‘ cwdPathName’ into the ‘ pathname’ buffer. This function is specifically used only in the ‘ ls’ and ‘ pwd’ shell commands.

fs_stat

This function retrieves comprehensive directory or file information from a specified path, primarily used by the ‘ ls’ shell command. The function duplicates the path to prevent tampering with the original path and parses it through ‘ parsePath’ to locate the selected entry. Once successfully located, the function extracts and assigns information to the buffer structure, such as size, block size, creation time, and number of blocks occupied. The function returns 0 on success and -1 on failure.

Directory Functions:

initDirectory

This function initializes a directory with a predefined minimum number of entries and assigns it to its parent directory. It calculates the memory required and initializes all the directory entries with their respective data, such as time, size, location, etc. However, the function reserves the first and second entries for the “.” (current directory) and “..” (parent directory), which have their unique trait (their parent/name) that differs from the other empty entries. All that information is then written to the volume using ‘ writeBlock’ and returns the pointer to the initialized directory entries.

expandDirectory

This function doubles the size of an existing directory to make room for more entries. It calculates the memory required and initializes all the directory entries with their respective data, such as time, size, location, etc. It allocates new memory, copies the existing directory entries in the directory, and initializes the latest entries to a default state. All that information is then written to the volume using ‘ writeBlock’ and returns the pointer to the initialized directory entries.

freeDirectory

This function frees the memory allocated for a directory entry, ensuring that it does not free any globally important directories, such as the root directory or the current working directory.

fs_mkdir

The 'md' shell command primarily uses this function to create a subdirectory or a new directory. It first duplicates the path to prevent any alterations to the original one. It then parses the path through 'parsePath' to acquire the information of the parent directory. The function then checks for available space in the parent directory to accommodate the new subdirectory. If there isn't enough space, the function will expand the directory using 'expandDirectory.' Next, it will check if the directory exists before initializing a new directory with 'initDirectory.' Lastly, the function writes the new directory into the parent directory using 'memcpy' and to disk using 'writeBlock.' The function will return a negative integer if any error occurs and zero on success.

fs_rmdir

This function removes a directory primarily used by the 'rm' shell command, taking in pathname for the first parameter, which is the path of the directory to delete, and returning 0 on success or -1 for error. This function will first parse the path given in the first parameter using 'parsePath' to populate the parse info structure, which locates the specified directory. But to start deleting the directory, we need to check if the directory is empty or not; using 'isEmpty' and loading the directory that we want to delete, return -1 if the directory is not empty. Next is to update the free space; we changed the FAT table, cleared the sentinel value, and pointed it to the next node in the linked list. Then, write the new FAT back into volume. Finally, we need to update the parent directory of the deleted directory; we just set the location of that directory in the parent to -1, which will mark it as unused and overwritten when we add new entries to the parent directory.

fs_opendir

This function opens the directory and initializes the 'fdDir' structure. This structure holds information about the directory, similar to a file descriptor but for directories, and its corresponding entries for later use with 'fs_readdir.' The function initially parses the path with ‘`parsePath`’ to locate the last constituent entry. Next, it instantiates the ‘`dirp`’ structure before populating it with its respective data, such as the record’s length, directory entry position, and directory. The function returns the ‘`dirp`’ structure on success and NULL on failure.

`fs_readdir`

This function reads the next directory entry. If there are more entries to read, it will find the next valid directory entry, update the ‘`dirp->di`’ information, and update the position in the ‘`dirp->dirEntryPosition`’ for the next read. If there are no more entries, it returns NULL.

`fs_closedir`

The function cleans up and frees unused data from ‘`fs_opendir`,’ ‘`fs_readdir`,’ and ‘`fs_closedir`.’

`fs_isFile`

This function checks if a given path is a file. It first parses the path with ‘`parsePath`’ to locate the last constituent entry. The function will then check whether the entry ‘`isDirectory`’ character is not a ‘d,’ meaning it is a file. It will return one if the entry is a file and zero if not.

`fs_isDir`

This function checks if a given path is a directory, similar to ‘`fs_isFile`.’ It first parses the path with ‘`parsePath`’ to locate the last constituent entry. The function will then check whether the entry ‘`isDirectory`’ character is a ‘d,’ meaning it is a directory. It will return one if the entry is a directory and zero if not.

`fs_delete`

This function, primarily used by the ‘`rm`’ shell command, removes a file. This function works the same as the remove directory; the only difference is that this function deletes a file without having to check if the file is empty or not. This function takes in pathname for the first parameter, which is the path of the file to delete, and it returns 0 on success of -1 for error. This function will first parse the path given in the first parameter using ‘`parsePath`’ to populate the parse info structure, which will be used to find where the file will be deleted. Next, we will update the free space using parse path info; we changed the FAT table, cleared the sentinel value, and pointed it to the next node in the linked list. Then, write the new FAT back into volume. Finally, we need to update the parent directory of the deleted file; we just set the location of that directory in the parent to -1, which will mark it as unused and overwritten when we add new entries to the parent directory.

fs_move

This function handles the 'mv' shell command to move a file or directory from the source directory to the destination directory. It takes in the source path name for the first parameter, which is the path of the source file/directory, and the destination path name of where to move the file/directory. Since this function modifies a directory entry, we first store the current time when the function is called to update the time-modified variable in our directory entry structure. To move from one directory to another, we need to use 'parsePath' on the two paths to fill in the corresponding parse path info to find the parent directory, the index of that entry in the parent, and the name of that entry. We can use the parse path info from the destination path to 'findUnusedDE' and store the source entry into that new unused directory entry. If that directory is full, we call 'expandDirectory' to grow the directory size and get the latest unused index in the newly sized directory. Next, we copy the directory entry from the source file/directory to the destination file/directory using memcpy. Before writing the new parent directories back into volume, we need to mark the source directory as unused by setting the size to zero and location to -1. Finally, we write the new parent directories into our volume using 'writeBlock' to ensure our free space isn't trampled all over and cause overwritten data.

Free Space Functions:

initFreeSpace

This function initializes the file allocation table (FAT) free space management system and assigns the sentinel value for the volume control block, FAT, and the calculated end of free space. It will then link the free space blocks together by pointing the current index to the next. This link takes on a more array-based linked list format without nodes since we did not have to store any data alongside the index. The last part of the function is writing the FAT to disk using 'LBAwrite' and assigning the volume control block's initial values, returning 0 on success and -1 on failure.

getFreeBlocks

This function retrieves a specific number of free blocks from the FAT system. It verifies that there is enough free space for the requested amount and modifies the tail end of an existing file if the function is expanding an entry. The function traverses the FAT and acquires the requested free space, marking the end with a sentinel value. Lastly, the FAT is updated in disk with 'LBAwrite' before returning the index of the first free block requested or -1 on failure.

writeBlock

This function writes a specified number of blocks to the disk (or volume) starting at a specific location. It sequentially writes each block from the buffer into the volume using 'LBAwrite' and updates the location for the next block using the FAT to ensure accuracy. The function returns the number of blocks successfully written or -1 if any error occurs.

readBlock

This function reads or, more terminologically accurate, loads the blocks into memory. Like 'writeBlock', it reads a specified number of blocks to memory starting at a specific location. It reads each block from the buffer sequentially using 'LBRead' while traversing the FAT. The function returns the number of blocks read or -1 if any error occurs.

seekBlock

This helper function acquires the specified block several blocks from the given location. It traverses the FAT and returns the acquired block's location or -1 on failure. The function's primary purpose is to traverse an entry's blocks until it reaches the end.

Basic I/O functions:

b_init

This function simply initializes the file system. It iterates through the file control block array and sets each respective buffer to NULL, indicating a free slot.

b_getFCB

This function retrieves a free file control block element. It iterates through the 'fcbArray' and seeks a file control block with an empty buffer. The function returns the index to the free file control block or -1 if none are free.

b_open

This function opens a buffered file and prepares it for other operations in 'b_write' or 'b_read.' It first acquires a file descriptor using 'b_getFCB' and uses 'parsePath' to locate the file, creating a new one if it doesn't exist and the create flag is specified. Next, if the truncate flag is specified, it'll ensure that the entry is a file, set the entry's location to indicate an empty file, and set the size to zero. The function removes any subsequent data in the file using 'deleteBlob' and populates the file control block with its appropriate initial data. The file descriptor is returned on success or -1, indicating an error.

b_write

This function is used mainly by 'cp' and 'cp2fs' to write to a file using the provided buffer. The first parameter is the file descriptor, provided by the file control block to allow multiple files to open simultaneously; this is why this parameter is essential so that the write function opens the correct file descriptor. The following parameter is the buffer, which contains data to be written into a file. Last is the count, which tells us how much we will write from the buffer. This function will return the bytes written to the file. Since this function modifies a file, we will update the date modified in the parent's directory entry. Next, we will load the file control block from the provided descriptor. If the file is a fresh new file without any data on our volume or ran out of space while writing, we will grow the file size to fit all the data provided in the buffer. This function can handle different cases of the buffer; if the provided buffer is larger than the block size, we can write the entire buffer into disk after knowing how many blocks the buffer takes up and write the whole thing using 'writeBlock'. Then, we check if our buffer is full; if not, we will call this function again to add more data to the provided buffer. We will do this until our buffer is full, which we will then write our buffer into disk. If the provided buffer still has data, we would have to repeat the same steps until the provided buffer runs out. Finally, we flush out the remaining data in our buffer into disk and update the new size into the parent directory.

b_read

This function reads from a given file descriptor and returns the number of bytes read and its corresponding contents as a buffer. It achieves this in three significant parts:

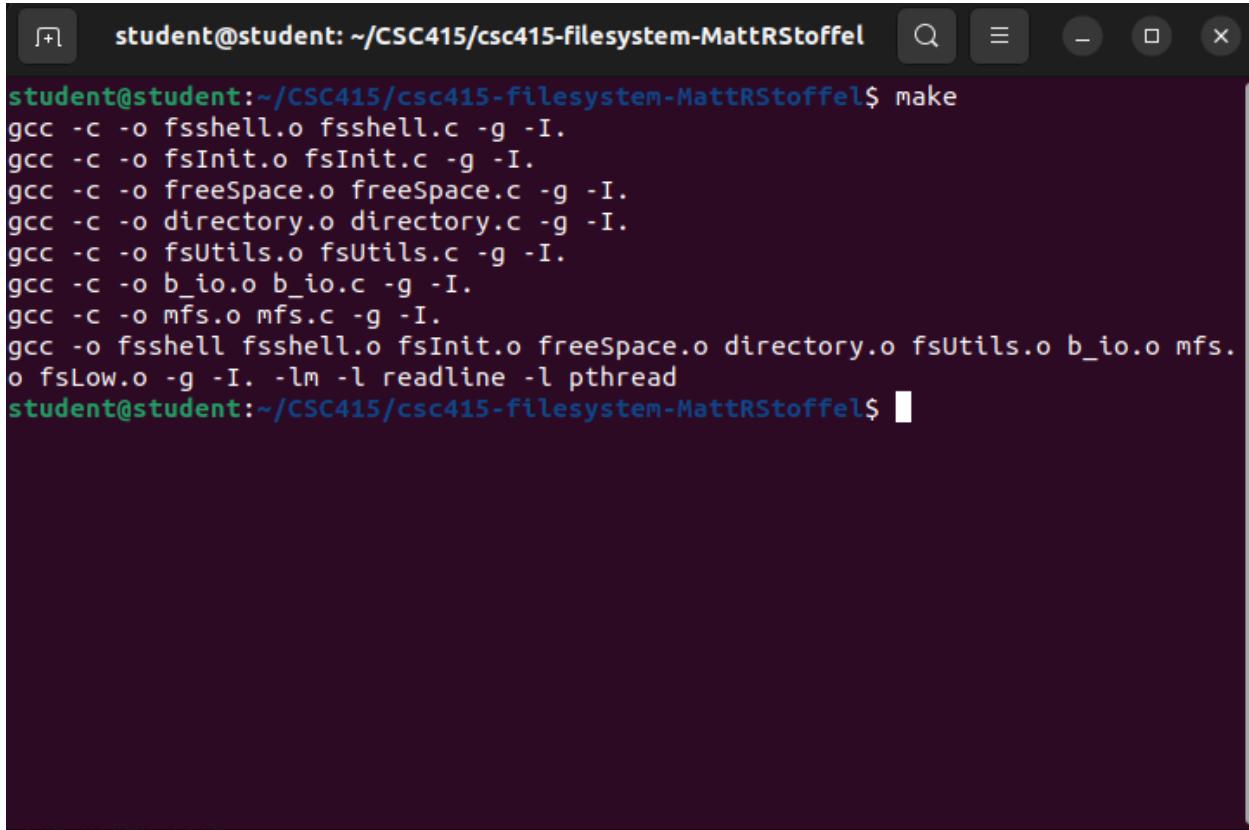

- Part 1: Read the contents of the current buffer
- Part 2: the requested amount is greater than our buffer; it is read directly from the disk to the caller buffer
- part 3: read any remaining bytes into the caller's buffer

The final combined product of parts 1, 2, and 3 forms the file's contents.

b_close

This function releases unused resources from the buffered file operations. It also sets the file control block's file information and buffer to NULL, marking it free.

Brainstormed ideas of function:

fs_init:

Blocks/2c = 512;
init file system (total size volume)

VcB* vcb ←
assign vcb to Block 0

VcB* vcb = malloc(Blocks/2c)
Read first Block
LBA(vcb, 1, 0) ↘???

check if the signature is the same if (vcb → signature == some number)
{
 Load Volume ← idk not my problem
}
else {
 vcb → signature = 1234
 vcb → Blocks/2c = 521
 vcb → total size = total size volume call free space function ← not my problem ↗ vcb → free space location = return value from free space funct ↗ vcb → freespace size = return value from free space function same for rootdir: call function get return value vcb → rootlocation = return value from root dir function
}

```

struct VCB
{
    long signature;           // to identify VCB

    int blockSize;            // size of each block
    int totalBlocks;          // total blocks in volume

    int freeSpaceLocation;   // location to free space block
    int totalFreeSpace;       // total free blocks

    int rootLocation;         // location to root directory

VCB;

```

fs_rmdir and fs_delete prototype

To delete a file:

- Load parent using parsePath
- Disk level:
  - o Clear the blocks related to the file (set all to NULL)
  - o Update the FAT:
    - Change sentinel value to first free block
    - Change FAT[location] to first free block
- Directory level:
  - o Clear DE of file in parent
  - o Mark that DE as used
  - o Write new dir into disk
